becoming too numerous, that an immense increase of work is required to secure academic distinctions, and that the effect of the widening of the range of necessary studies is to secure cream rather than culture. There can be no question that the present tendency in schools, colleges, and Universities is to increase the number of studies, and that the result is not always on the side of thoroughness. Not long ago classics and mathematics were supposed to be all that was necessary to a perfect University curriculum, and the theory in England has been that one of these is about enough for a single student.

Rightly or wrongly, Universities are now expected to teach a good deal besides Greek, Latin, and mathematics. Systematic complaints have been made as to the narrowness of the range of our own University, but of the four chairs at present in existence only two are devoted to classics and mathematics. In the selection of the subjects with which the University is in the habit of dealing, considerable freedom has been allowed, but the undergraduates control the freedom ought to be wider. What they say is that, with two compulsory subjects, candidates are unable to acquire distinction in some special branch, and that it is sometimes better to know one subject thoroughly than to have a scanty knowledge of more than one. Provided the change asked for would have the effect of giving students a thorough knowledge of one subject, there can be little said against its adoption. On the contrary, there is much to be urged in its favour. It might be undesirable to have a majority, or even a considerable percentage, of students selecting one subject instead of two; but if thoroughness were insisted upon, the narrow selection would not be likely to be very generally made. The world occasionally finds a use for a specialist, and if men are to acquire special knowledge they must have opportunities for special study. As long as classics or mathematics are taught it will be worth while to have men of distinction in these lines. Such men will have their limitations; it may not be for the good of the University or the country that they should be unduly multiplied.

they should be unduly multiplied. There is, however, very little danger of this. The tendency of the age is in the direction of a slovenly omniscience rather than in that of securing exceptional proficiency in special branches of study. What the undergraduates are asking, indeed, is little more than that the proviso attached to the 60th bylaw shall become the bylaw. At present if a candidate passes in the first class in honors in any given school he gets his degree; the alteration asked for would give a student his degree if he passed at all. The proposal, therefore, is not a very revolutionary one, and must commend itself

In the event, however, of the Senate taking up the question of these bylaws, it will be worth while considering whether some modification will not be necessary in the matter of degrees. There is nothing to justify the giving the degree of Bachelor of Arts as the result of a successful examination in natural science. A degree in arts pre-supposes a course of study in languages, literature, and mathematics—not in chemistry or geology, which, however important, is something totally different. Besides, apart from the question of utility altogether, while classics and mathematics are almost of necessity matters of culture, as frequently handled in universities certain branches of natural science become largely matters of

GALLOWAY, himself a successful teacher of chemistry, says that on two occasions he "passed a friend for the examination in chemistry at the London Medical School, by preparing and writing out for him twelve questions with the answers, which the candidate committed to memory. On each occasion eleven out of the twelve questions were set, and the examinee whose knowledge of chemistry dated from the night previous to the examination obtained the silver medal. A result like this could hardly have followed an examination in Greek, Latin, or mathe-

an examination in Greek, Latin, and mathematics. "The art of solving mathematical problems," says the Saturday Review in a recent article on the subject of scientific education, "may be and is cultivated; but no one can learn it without acquiring a real command of the instruments and method of mathematical reasoning. The art of translating Greek and Latin into English and English into Greek and Latin may be and is cultivated; but no one can turn a difficult passage of Greek or Latin into correct and idiomatic English, or produce a respectable Greek or Latin version.

of a passage from a good English author, without having acquired a real and well-grounded knowledge of the mechanism and structure of a language." The correctness of this will hardly be questioned. There are, of course, other modes of teaching chemistry besides those described by the author named, under any circumstances mere proficiency in natural science could hardly be said to entitle a student to the degree of Bachelor of Arts.

Looked at from a purely political point of view, there are many conveniences attaching to the system of leaving the Prime Minister unencumbered by the cares of a department. Yet it is not an English practice, although in the English Cabinet there are one or two comparatively sinecure offices which a Premier can take if he chooses. As a rule, however, English Premiers are in the habit of taking important offices. But they have every help in the way of under-secretaries both permanent and part-time. Comparing great things with

The Browne Bothwell Castle, belonging to Messrs. A. & B. Maclean's firm of London traders, arrived yesterday at 11 a.m. The ship was a fine one. There was a good run from Fremantle, where it was 14 days. She shows very little evidence of the heavy weather encountered when nearing the Australian coast. A 4 years old, a new Atlantic, and a new Pacific. The ship was built in the United States, and was sent to a deep tank on Saturday, and was rescued by a boat, who jumped in after him. NEW YORK, Oct. 15.

What are known as the "Star route" cases, about which I wrote several months ago, will probably be tried next week at Washington, and some very interesting revelations are anticipated. Under the administration of Mr. Hayes, the post-office was a place of the most splendid and pure business, the most impudent and marvellous fashion. The assistant postmaster, Brady, who approved the contracts for carrying the mails, was the head of the ring, and instigated the frauds. He has related for his indictment by threatening to tell all he knows about certain very prominent public men. At one time it seemed quite possible that his tactics would result in the cases being dropped, but the present Postmaster-General, Mr. James, has been loyally supported by the New York Times, the same paper which dragged Tweed to ruin, and Mr. Arthur has

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The theatrical season is now fairly opened, and has been blessed with a number of failures. Indeed, the first season has yet to be scored, with Mr. Daly alone having produced three absolutely stillborn pieces. Mr. Booth is playing Shakespeare at the theatre which bears his name, and is doing fairly, but not as well as he would like. Lawrence Barrett is also producing the legitimate drama at Harvard Square, and is doing well. The new theatre is still running at the Bijou and the Metropolitan Casino, and are well supported—much better than the stars and the heavy legitimate. At the Union Square, Miss Gansvoive Ward is drawing well in "Forget me not." On Monday, Colonel Mapleson begins his regular season of Italian opera, opening with "Lobengrin." An actor named M'Quinn, the "Poet of the Slaves," is doing a great deal of advertising out of a well-timed quarrel. In a recent interview, Rankin told a reporter that Joaquin Miller never wrote a line of the "Danites," but was paid 7000 dollars for the use of his name. Miller replied in an angry letter, saying, among other things that Rankin was the "most colossal liar and the most dishonest scoundrel" he had ever known. The next morning Rankin's arrest for criminal libel. Of course, the proceedings have come to nothing, although it has called the public attention to the fact that several years ago it was formally decided that to call a man a "literary thief" was not libel, within the meaning of the statute.

THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD

I may state in conclusion that there was not one gentleman composing that Bench but had the greatest respect for the law, and the upholding the law, and the protection of the public, which was in this case imperilled.

Yours, &c.,

H. T. PENFOLD.

Tohu nui had ordered them, even if they were all arrested on the spot. So the proceedings of the court of fifth— the bloodless battle of Parikahi. It is impossible to read the account of the proceedings without being struck with the air of burlesque which surrounds them or without admiring the calm dignity and thorough good temper of the natives, Tohu, and their followers. All Sunday the entire regiment assembled at the residence of Mahealani, and was to disperse to return to their hapa; was posted up, but they took no notice of it. On the following day all the whares in Parikahi were searched for arms and ammunition, the assembled natives looking calmly on without remark. In Parikahi and surrounding paha, all the more than 800 firearms, varying from old blunderbusses to good modern rifles, and a vast quantity of cartridges were collected. On Thursday, as the natives showed no intention of dispersing, the arresting company of A. C.'s again entered Parikahi, and arrested more than 20 men, who were identified as being members of the Wanganui tribe, and therefore having no right to be at Parikahi. More arrests have since taken place, and the natives are now all together in custody. Mr. Bryce got two of their own chiefs up to try and get them to go to their own homes; but the men would not listen; they simply replied that Te Whaiti was the only authority they recognised. It is difficult, if not impossible, to identify the women and children belonging to these

The chief social event of the last fortnight has been the consecration of the Christchurch Cathedral, which has been in course of erection since 1856. It is a very fine building, erected from the designs by Sir Gilbert Scott, which has been bought out by the original Canterbury Pilgrims. Only a portion has as yet been completed. The consecration ceremony was the most imposing one, and was performed by the Primate, the Right Rev. Dr. Harper, Bishop of Christchurch, who was assisted by several other bishops, church dignitaries, and a large assemblage of laymen. The Governor, Mr. Sedgwick, was prevented by a severe cold from attending, and his presence has been regretted. The Metropolitan Race Meeting and Canterbury Agricultural and Pastoral Show took place in Christchurch last week, and attracted a great concourse of visitors. Both were most successful gatherings.

I omitted, when writing of native matters, to say anything of the most important of the field work of the Government. An old military officer, who was some 25 years of age, told me he never saw a finer body of men under arms, and that their steadiness, obedience, and readiness were beyond all praise. They had real hard work and some bad weather at the front. The only charge made against them was an accusation of wastefulness, killing a pig or two and taking some of the best of the country for their own use.
